Read the passage and answer the following questions.

John Marston's 1599 play, Antonio's Revenge, a quintessential example of Jacobean revenge tragedy, has long puzzled critics with its dark, unsettling ending. Many scholars find the play's conclusion to be uncharacteristically violent and morally ambiguous, with its so-called "heroic" characters acting like villains and escaping punishment for their heinous crimes. This perceived lack of poetic justice has led some critics to speculate on Marston's intentions, attributing the play's strange tone to his purported cruel nature, or even suggesting that he was an incompetent playwright who struggled to manage the genre's conventions. A more nuanced view, however, understands the play's shocking climax as a deliberate artistic choice, a cynical commentary on the very nature of revenge itself, perhaps even a parody of other, more straightforward revenge tragedies popular at the time.

One prevailing interpretation suggests that Antonio's Revenge presents emotion as a corruptive force by continually linking it with the human body. According to Renaissance philosophy, the human body was the seat of sin and decay—a sordid counterpart to the virtuous soul. In Antonio's Revenge, the connection between corrupt emotion and the corrupt body is present in both language and action. References to the body in this play are almost always negative: corpses rot, bloody wounds cry out, and ribcages burst with anguish. Because the human body is both the cause and conduit of this pain, emotions that arise from the body, such as rage or lust—both of which were thought to come from the liver—are also necessarily negative. This link between the emotional and the physical is reinforced throughout the play.

In promising to avenge his father's death, for example, Antonio vows that his heart will "beat on" vengeance—that is, it will be both fixated on and be powered by the thought of revenge. Encouraged by the ghost of his murdered father, Antonio further swears: "May I be numbed with horror and my veins / Pucker with singeing torture, if my brain / Digest a thought but of dire vengeance! / May I be fettered slave to coward chance, / If blood, heart, brain, plot aught save vengeance!" In these lines, Antonio urges his blood, heart, and brain to be wholly consumed with revenge. He imagines that his brain will "digest" his thoughts, creating a doubly corporeal image. Furthermore, the consequences he imagines for himself—being "numbed with horror" and having his veins "pucker with singeing torture"—emphasize the physicality of his promise to revenge his father's murder. Avenging his father's death thus becomes not only an act of justice, but also an act of bodily necessity. By committing all of his major organs to the cause of revenge, Antonio makes revenge part of his physiology. In binding vengeance to the human body, Antonio builds on traditional early modern concepts of the dichotomy between the body and the soul, using the theory of the corrupt body to justify all of the ghastly violence that follows. The primary antagonist, Piero, who has brutally murdered Antonio's father, becomes a focal point for Antonio's bodily-driven quest for retribution.
